

If I am paying a fee for a service which includes material such as traffic reports, that is my right. I am an adult and have a right to choose services that I want. Who is the FCC to tell me otherwise? Mr. Powell has no right to enter my home or vehicle and decide what and what not I can purchase and watch or listen to. Maybe Mr. Powell should get together with his daddy and instead of dictating what and what not people can listen too, should come up with plans for emergency radios. Maybe then VHF and UHF two-way radios would perform better in an emergency such as what occurred on 9-11-01. As a side note, if you read the FCC's home page and click on Powell's name you will read the following, and I quote:

"Welcome to my Internet home page! I hope that you will find this site a valuable source of information about me and my capable staff, as well as the Federal Communications Commission and the significant work performed by its dedicated employees."

Since when does Mr. Powell own Government property? This website is owned by the American People not by someone who had daddy get them a job.

Steve